

Building Information Modeling

The construction industry is expected to experience growth in building activity, particularly in the next few years. Considering this, stakeholders are eager to utilize digital 3D models to improve data availability and decision-making. Therefore, Building Information Modeling (BIM) is becoming increasingly necessary in the construction industry. It aims to reduce the time and cost associated with handling, redoing, reworking, maintaining, and addressing emergencies related to buildings and infrastructure.

We are thrilled to announce a 4-week online training program on BIM to familiarize participants with facility management processes, tools, and compliances according to the Canadian context.

This program will offer training on Engineering Communications and Critical Thinking. Participants will also receive personalized support with the Professional Engineers of Ontario's licensing process, employment preparation, job search, and networking opportunities with professionals and employers in this field.
